redefining physical SPACE

Maximizing the useable footprint of an office interior often means getting creative in terms of utilizing every part of the building's "bones", including ceilings and walls. It can also mean tapping into customizable architectural products, like moveable glass walls, that will help you create interior division where none had existed before. These solutions promote the idea that today's businesses can adapt quickly to changing market conditions without the need for major construction or rehab of the building itself. Often, the use of moveable walls, space division, and acoustic products promote less waste, better ROI, and even big tax advantages as well.

The smart approach is to take a look at the current footprint from every angle and to decide if moveable, flexible solutions make sense within the space you are looking to create. Does it work to create the type of division you need? Do the acoustics make sense for the traffic within the space? Are there other wall-mounted elements that can elevate the space and add needed functionality? Define your goals and seek all options before making the more risky option of construction.

Privacy and space division can appear in unexpected and creative ways by utilizing products specifically designed to rise to the task. Define open spaces by forming targeted work areas through stand-alone or fully enclosed room-within-a-room solutions.

Dividers can also differentiate space when configured in a linear wall application, potentially adding multifunctional elements to the wall, including tack or markerboards, glass panels for light throughput, and planters and signage to finish the space.

Divide and define spaces while accounting for other needs within an environment, like overhead lighting or visual and acoustical features. Many of these products are highly customizable offering a wide range of solutions for ceilings, walls, and furniture applications.

As an added benefit, these elements incorporate layers of interest through color, texture, and pattern, thereby enhancing the overall design of the space as well as employee well-being.
