For individual FOCUSED work

making a plan for PRIVACY and PRODUCTIVITY

Today's private offices look a lot different than the private offices of the past. While still designed to give workers an individualized, focused space to work solo, they are often being designed with different work zones in mind...places within the office where impromptu meetings and spontaneous creativity can happen. The key to successful private office design is to minimize distraction, but invite collaboration at the same time—combining a devoted work space for heads-down work, and a place for guests to gather for conversation and team work.

adaptability IS KEY

Versatility and adaptability bring a new level of dynamism and workplace wellness to a private workspace.

It's no secret that a well-designed work environment can impact productivity in a positive way, but how can you harness the best use of your space? Private offices benefit from possibilities, particularly within ergonomic standards.

Creating different work zones with different desktop heights, for example, is a great way to accommodate mobility and workplace wellness. Look for ways to tailor a space for day-to-day ergonomic alterations to bolster productivity and workplace satisfaction.

SIGNATURE style

When it comes to private office design, individual style is important, but it should work well with all other workspaces for continuity throughout the building. Should the design reflect a minimalistic look with clean and contemporary lines? A more traditional presence with elegant and oversized furniture? Modern and fun with bright colors and trendy accessories? Infusing individuality is a great design step, but ensure that the choices flow with the organization's overall style and brand messaging.

a dynamic SPACE

A second layer of adaptability comes from reconfigurable, modular pieces. Separate sideboards, shelving, and storage units can be tailor-made to individual requirements, but ready to adapt if and when requirements change. Reshape the room by moving components, adding new modules, and increasing storage or display functionality easily, at any time.

No matter the size of the footprint or the requirements of the space, now or in the future, there is a perfect solution for each individual need, and we can help!
